

A Family Medicine Without Alcohol

Ayer's Sarsaparilla is a tonic and alterative, free from alcohol. What is a "tonic"? A medicine that imparts strength or tone; a medicine that builds up, gives vigor and power. What is an "alterative"? A medicine that alters or changes unhealthy action to healthy action. Ayer's Sarsaparilla does all this without stimulation. Ask your doctor if a family medicine, like Ayer's Sarsaparilla, is not vastly better without alcohol than with it.

THE STAR'S TEN MINUTE STORY

Wrong Method

As Aunt Agatha settled back in her seat in the chair car she thought, with a delicious thrill, that for one whole month she would be away from the strenuous life at her brother Bob's. Five children and a delicate mother meant hard work and Aunt Agatha had begun to show the strain. Her heart absolutely turned a somersault when a letter came from her niece, Helen Dudley, inviting her to spend a month with them.

It was two years since Helen's marriage, and Aunt Agatha had felt a little hurt that an invitation had not been forthcoming. True, no one else had visited Helen, but then she had stood by Helen staunchly when objections had been raised to her marriage to Herbert Dudley.

The fact was Aunt Agatha had a sincere liking for Dudley. She did not put the slightest stock in certain stories about his wildness. She repeatedly told her brother Bob there was not one spot where maligners could trip their finger down firmly and triumphantly say, "There."

As time went on everybody began to believe Aunt Agatha was right; the young people evidently were very happy. But Aunt Agatha could not help thinking that Helen might have invited her.

She saw Herbert at the gate as she walked along the platform, and it was the same old smile that she had always liked and, above all, trusted, that greeted her. "Great Scott, it's good to see you!" he cried as he tucked her hand through his arm. "It seems as though I was back in Grafton, just getting a peep at you. Tell me all about it—Helen? She's all right. She had some meeting at the house tonight, a club she belongs to, and—Oh, don't worry," he cried, seeing the crestfallen look, "they'll be out of the way when we get there."

Helen met them at the door, and at first Aunt Agatha thought it was the loving, joyous Helen of old, but when they went into the dining room and she got a good look at her as she sat at the head of the table she realized that the girlish Helen of two years ago had disappeared. In her place was a woman with heavy pouches under her eyes, a mouth that drooped into fretful wrinkles in the corners and eyes that had a sharp, suspicious gleam in them not good to see. Furtively she glanced at Herbert. A change there, too. His face was graver, and here were tired lines around his eyes, but in them shone the same fearless honest look that had always made her Herbert's friend. Aunt Agatha, that night lying sleepless, knew that something was woefully wrong. Herbert had gone when she came down to breakfast. Nothing was said during the day to lead her to believe that anything but the happiest relations existed between Helen and her husband.

The first ray of light came after dinner. Herbert as he picked up the pink sheets of the evening paper, said: "I don't believe the sporting extra will interest you, Aunt Agatha. I'm going to have my smoke and I will take it with me."

As their apartment was not large and they were then in the dining room, Aunt Agatha looked rather blank.

"Don't you smoke here?" she asked. Herbert's smile was rather strained. "The smoke gives Helen a headache," he said, "and—"

"Helen's headache," Aunt Agatha exclaimed. "That's something new, isn't it, Helen? At home—my goodness! your father and the boys used to have the air blue. You seemed to stand it all right then."

"A house is very different from a flat," Helen replied, a sharp edge in her voice. "When Herbert kept up that everlasting puffing after dinner our rooms fairly reeked of smoke all the time, the curtains were ruined and so—there was only one thing to do."

"And so," Herbert put in, "that thing was done. I've fixed up quite a smoking room in the basement, Aunt Agatha, and it goes great. I can tell you."

"I should think you would drop into your club for your after dinner smoke," Aunt Agatha suggested, "or it is too far?"

"My club?" he said as he left the room. "You'll have to find it for me."

"The clubs in the city are altogether too expensive," Helen explained, fidgeting with the magazine she had picked up, and what's more, they always lead to—other things."

"Oh!" was Aunt Agatha's only comment, but there was a vast amount of meaning in her voice. More light had been let in on the Dudley domestic affairs; and the next morning further enlightenment came. Just as she came out of her bedroom door she heard Herbert say, "We have a customer here from down the state. He has been turned over to me, and the chances are I will have to take him to the theater tonight, so don't wait up for me."

"A customer," Helen's voice had a musty sneer in it. "Can't you find a better excuse than that? You think I believe you?"

There was an angry crumpling of the paper as Herbert said, "For Heaven's sake Helen, cut that out! I'm tired of it, dead tired. I don't give a continental what you believe but don't make an exhibition of yourself before Aunt Agatha. For her sake—she has it hard enough at Bob's—I'll turn the fellow over to one of the boys. It's money out of my pocket, but anything to keep peace." Then the door slammed, and Aunt Agatha knew he had gone with his breakfast unfinished. He was as good as his word and came home to dinner at the usual hour as though nothing unpleasant had happened in the morning, but Helen met him with a gloomy face and Aunt Agatha was not at all surprised that he did not come up to his smoking room until bedtime.

The next morning he telephoned that they were so very busy he could not get home to dinner. It was eleven o'clock when Aunt Agatha heard his latch key. In a few moments Helen's voice was raised, angry, and there was a stubborn ring in Herbert's which a woman's nagging invariably wakes. Harsh, ugly accusations were hurled at him and he answered recklessly, neither denying nor affirming, and presently she heard him stride down the hall, leaving Helen scolding and sobbing in the parlor.

Next night Herbert did not come home to dinner and there was no message. The following morning Aunt Agatha had it out with Helen.

"Look here, Helen," she said abruptly, "how long is this state of affairs going to continue? Two years ago Herbert Dudley was one of the sunniest boys imaginable and you a lovable little girl. Now where are you? Herbert is unhappy; any one can see it; and you—why in the world are you gambling with your happiness? Why do you make life miserable? It is you, Helen. You don't like the truth," the relentless voice went on, "but you've got to face it unless you want to drive Herbert away from you completely. Listen, Helen, why is it you allow him so few liberties? You trusted him before you married him, when there were all sorts of false rumors circulating, and—"

"But I didn't hear the worst," Helen sobbed, "until—the day of our wedding. When I was dressing to go away Kate Morley told me, in all kindness I know—"

"Well, I don't," Aunt Agatha snapped. "She was trying to get rid of a little of the jealousy that had absolutely consumed her since your engagement to Herbert had been announced. Kate Morley, indeed! Now, go on, I'm going to get at the bottom of this."

"Do you remember that—that girl who clerked in Condon's? There was talk about her. Kate told me she had come to Chicago to live and that Herbert might—that she felt very sorry for me, because he—he had been seen with her in Grafton, and—Oh, you know the rest!"

"I know this: Herbert felt sorry for that girl. He didn't believe any of those lies any more than I did, and he was big enough to talk to her openly. I admired him for it and so did others. He's the kind of man that counts. That bit of gossip then is at the bottom of your trouble?"

"It didn't bother so very much about it until one night Herbert stayed out so late. Then I almost went wild thinking of—that girl. He said he had been at the club, but I made him give it up."

"Which he did to keep a moderate amount of peace in the house, I suppose. Why couldn't you stop at that? Why have you taken all his liberties away? If I were Herbert Dudley do you know what I would do? Cut it and run. You will drive him to do it yet, Helen, if you don't be your loving, sensible little self once more. In the first place, bring all his smoking paraphernalia up from the basement and tonight when he comes home just be the Helen of old Grafton days. See how it works."

Herbert was late again that night. A light of wonder, of dawning joy, flashed into his eyes as Helen went up to him with the sunny smile which had always been one of her greatest charms.

"Tired, Herb?" she asked. "Tired? I should say so!" he replied. "We've been awfully busy this week and—"

He stopped abruptly as his eyes caught the big easy chair wheeled to the table, the smoking jacket thrown across its back, and pipes spread out. Then he turned to Helen, standing with a conscious, rather confused, but very happy light on her face. "What does it mean, Helen?" he asked.

"Mean?" She went to him and, with a diffidence wholly lovable, drew his arm around her neck. "It means that Aunt Agatha has taught me that I am a regular old shrew; that I have been treating you abominably, and—and, oh, Herb, I'm awful sorry!" Aunt Agatha found that she had something very important to attend to in the dining room.

NEW YORKERS STUDY THE TURKEY TROT

NEW YORK, January 30.—When Mrs. Charles Henry Israel's Committee on Amusement and Vacation Resources for Working Girls found in the course of its watch on the dance halls of New York that it was necessary to strike out all the politer forms of "turkey trot" and "grizzly bear" dancing, it urged that there be established some standard of decency in social dancing.

What is good and what is bad? What was the answer for the working girl when she protested that every one was dancing the "turkey trot"? Was it all a confusion in terms?

To the end that these questions might be answered, and that the standard should begin to take form, the committee at its annual meeting today held a conference in the ballroom at Delmonico's, where those invited "might see and learn and, perhaps, set their own standards."

To this conference there was invited a most varied audience of 600 men and women, folk prominent in the social life of New York—settlement workers and city officials, clergymen, magazine writers, artists, license bureau inspectors, and city officials. This variety was sought in the hope that the ideas gained in the conference might radiate to many centers of influence.

The point brought out seemed to be that while the dance variants might be very prettily and properly performed, they were distinguished only by a series of imperceptible gradations from their indecent origins, and that for the dances to develop toward their uglier extremes was so easy as to be inevitable. That was the evolution, according to Professor Duryea, a teacher of dancing. "Right here on Fifth avenue I have seen it change in the course of the evening," he said.

Then he and Mrs. Duryea showed the development of one evening in the "turkey trot," with its objectionable possibilities. When Mrs. Israel asked how many had seen that very thing done in the dance halls, 600 hands went up. Professor Duryea seemed to believe that there was no safety in anything that departed from the "correct position" as in the impassable waltz.

As a final contribution to the conference, Professor Duryea signaled to the pianist, and away they went in "the Gaby glide," with the dance at its worst. A faintly-suppressed ripple of laughter could be heard as the movements were intensified.

At Jolson and Florence Cable, of the Winter Garden, explained in the vernacular, and exhibited the variations of current dances as emphasized behind the footlights and indicating their origin.

Jolson said he picked up the art as he saw it on the infamous "Barbary Coast" of San Francisco, where he used to sell papers as a boy. "It's all the same dance," he said, "call it 'turkey trot,' or 'bunny hug,' as you will. Stripped of the variations all the new variants drop into the one thing. There, in those fifteen or twenty dance halls, thriving as they did on the patronage of the half-drunken sailors of that port, the dance was born."

Dr. Henry Moskowitz concluded the conference by insisting that the committee was no society for the suppression of vice, but one dedicated to the big task of finding places where the buoyant spirits of those who "work to exist and live in their play" may find expression.

FORTIFICATIONS BILL REPORTED TO HOUSE.

WASHINGTON, February 15.—The fortifications appropriation bill today was reported to the House. It carries $4,036,235, which is $1,437,474 less than last year's appropriation and more than $3,000,000 less than the War Department's estimate for 1912. The present scheme of sea coast fortifications will cost in the aggregate $163,933,480 when finished. The scheme for the insular possessions will cost approximately $29,000,000.

BY AUTHORITY

Office of the Board of Health, Honolulu, Hawaii, February 23, 1912. Notice is hereby given that at a regular meeting of the Territorial Board of Health, held February 23, 1912, the following rules and regulations were unanimously adopted:

BE IT RESOLVED by the Board of Health of the Territory of Hawaii that the following rules and regulations be and the same are hereby made and adopted for the promotion of the public health, and especially for the prevention and suppression of diseases which may be caused or transmitted by mosquitoes, by providing against the breeding of mosquito larvae and prescribing the manner in which water in which mosquito larvae might otherwise breed shall be cared for so as to prevent such breeding within five miles of the harbor of Honolulu, the principal place of danger from such diseases.

SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful to have, keep, maintain or permit, within an area of five miles of the harbor of Honolulu, any cistern, tank or well or other receptacle of similar character containing water, or any pond, pool, spring, fountain or other body of water of similar character, or any rice or taro patch containing water, unless the water thereof or there-in shall be kept constantly treated with a solution of copper or other chemical agent or constantly covered with kerosene or petroleum oil or other substance so as effectually to prevent the breeding of mosquito larvae in the water therein or thereof or constantly kept sufficiently free of vegetable growth and other obstructions and stocked with mosquito-destroying fish, or constantly so screened with wire netting of at least eighteen wires to the inch each way or otherwise so covered as to prevent the ingress and egress of mosquitoes to and from the water therein or thereof, or unless by emptying and drying or cleansing any such container of water or otherwise adequate means be employed so as effectually to prevent the breeding of mosquito larvae in any such water or container.

Section 2. It shall be unlawful to have, keep, maintain or permit, within such area, any other body of water or any other receptacle containing water in which mosquito larvae might otherwise breed or any thing or condition which might otherwise enable mosquito larvae to breed, unless adequate means be employed so as effectually to prevent the breeding of any such mosquito larvae.

Section 3. The above rules and regulations shall be self-operative and obligatory upon each person or corporation or public officer or employee who or which by reason of ownership, tenancy, occupancy, possession, authority or obligation of law, appointment or employment, or otherwise, has for the time being sufficient control or authority over any premises within such area, to observe, perform or enforce such rule or regulation in respect thereto, and the said person and its officers and agents may at all reasonable times enter in and upon and inspect any premises within such area and all buildings thereon, in order to ascertain whether these rules and regulations are being observed and to enforce the same.

THE BOARD OF HEALTH, By its President, J. S. B. PRATT

Attest: K. R. PORTER, Secretary, the Board of Health.

I hereby consent to the foregoing rules and regulations. W. F. FREAR, Governor, Territory of Hawaii.
